

*Located between Washington's Olympic Peninsula and Canada's Vancouver Island, the waters of the Strait of Juan de Fuca lap the shore of the Olympic Peninsula's Makah Nation lands.
This place is a Point of Origin, and its essence restores connection in a fragmented world.*

Makah

(Straight of San Juan de Fuca)

for integration and connection in a fragmented world

The mist is rising off the bay with sunrise.
The Olympic Mountain Range appears like a vision through the veil.
Tenderly, the water here caresses the shoreline.
Softly, the wind moves through the channel.
The voices of night gently fade
as morning song opens the prayer of this new day.

This place is a Point of Origin, and its essence restores connection in a fragmented world.

We have,
on our journey here as Earth brothers, become increasingly disassociated from our food, our clothing, our land, and our community fire.
In the pursuit of easiness
we have created
the most complicated, disconnected lives imaginable.
This Pacific Ocean water..... that has touched all corners of the world,
that has welcomed babies' feet and old women's tired bones..... it touches and moves and integrates the energies on this planet.
As it moves through this protected narrow place between the Olympic Peninsula and Vancouver its message is one of unification and connection.
It teaches us
that the only way to find true peace and happiness is to come home
and to allow all the beauty and blessings of this world to be poured into the narrows of our life that we may experience this flow of connection with our world and universe.

The essence helps to restore attention and gratefulness
and, at the same time, releases our need for constant motion and “getting to” the next destination.

It teaches that our connection, observations, and learning during each step of our journey restore true peace and offer everlasting contentment and joy.
